

In fast-moving strategic moments, what matters isn't just what's happening out there, it's how that landscape gets bent around your fork in the road.

- The decision-anchored style forces alignment: it narrows fuzzy market signals into a judgment scaffolding.
- The domain-anchored style preserves expansion: it contextualizes, but leaves the framing of the question open.

This is a tension between action-ready decision guidance and exploratory strategic immersion.

The former is ideal when the decision is already scoped. The latter is powerful when the decision is still being shaped.
